

This is a peer-reviewed, final published version of the following document:

Gravestock, Philip and Mason O'Connor, Kristine (2008)
Editors' Introduction. Learning and Teaching in Higher Education (3). pp. 1-2.

EPrint URI: <https://eprints.glos.ac.uk/id/eprint/3846>

Disclaimer

The University of Gloucestershire has obtained warranties from all depositors as to their title in the material deposited and as to their right to deposit such material.

The University of Gloucestershire makes no representation or warranties of commercial utility, title, or fitness for a particular purpose or any other warranty, express or implied in respect of any material deposited.

The University of Gloucestershire makes no representation that the use of the materials will not infringe any patent, copyright, trademark or other property or proprietary rights.

The University of Gloucestershire accepts no liability for any infringement of intellectual property rights in any material deposited but will remove such material from public view pending investigation in the event of an allegation of any such infringement.

PLEASE SCROLL DOWN FOR TEXT.

Editors' Introduction

The scholarship of inclusion in higher education informs and permeates the range of papers, case studies and reviews in this issue of LATHE.

Explicitly and implicitly, contributors indicate an imperative to move from rhetoric about inclusion towards effective strategies for implementation; they also advocate the need to further advance our understanding by subjecting 'inclusion' to ongoing theoretical analysis, critique and evaluation. Such examination is particularly required in the case of 'commonly held' categories and concepts which shape and inform the scholarship of inclusion. As Jan Noyes observed in her review of Thomas & Quinn's international study of 'First Generation Entry into Higher Education' the very term 'first generation' is problematic. Mona El-Ayoubi emphasises that for 'inclusive approaches to be explored practically, it is important to rethink traditional interpretations of identity and consider identity as fluid and changing'. The dynamic aspect of inclusion is highlighted by Val Chapman in her rigorous exposition of equality legislation and its relation to education: 'the truly 'inclusive approach' focuses on flexibility'.

In discussions of inclusion questions of clarity and transparency of intellectual and educational purposes are considered by contributors. Chanock, for instance, in her paper questioning reliance on written assessments in the humanities, argues that concerns about deploying a range of alternative assessments 'might be countered by making these purposes more explicit so that students can more readily fulfil them'.

The necessity for effective staff and educational development is addressed by a number of contributors. Alan Hurst poses pertinent questions about staff development and illustrates ways of addressing them; Val Chapman presents an extensive range of case studies and questions for consideration; and Judith Waterfield & Bob West highlight inclusive approaches to curriculum design. In presenting a study of how staff from a university's partner organisation are supported, Martin & Barlow raise the important issue of ensuring that staff and educational development is, itself, inclusive.

Paramount in the work of the scholarship of inclusion in higher education is that the voices and experiences of hitherto marginalised underrepresented groups and individuals are heard and that they have the opportunity to contribute to knowledge construction and pedagogy for effective inclusion.

Reflecting on an initiative in her college to make theatre education inclusive, Kathy Dacre refers to 'ripples' maybe going on to 'make waves' in the theatre industry; an apt metaphor to stimulate and sustain further development of the scholarship of inclusion in higher education.

Phil Gravestock and Kristine Mason O'Connor
University of Gloucestershire, UK.